

HEXACORALLIA LUXUS

BY J MCDONALD

COLLECTION DESCRIPTION

Contemporary United States Hexacorallia Luxus is a rare and recently discovered species of lamp, not easily classified into standard taxonomies. While debate over whether Hexacorallia indeed belongs to the Object Kingdom and not the Plant or Animal Kingdom persists, we must attempt to define and categorize it based on our current - if limited - understanding. Even if we restrict our efforts to within the Object Kingdom, it is difficult to determine whether Hexacorallia ought to belong to the Supellex family (common name: Furniture) or whether it shares more in common with members of the Sculptura family. Surely it has a close affinity with other sculpture - its expressive form, its conceptual underpinnings, its spirit and presence - would place it squarely in that family. And yet it cannot be denied that its ability to illuminate its surroundings, its exquisite craftsmanship, and its frequent habitation alongside humans suggest that it could equally be classified along with other members of the Luxus Supellex genus. Identifying characteristics include an armourlike paper skin, the layers of which show yearly growth cycles (color may vary, though known specimen are a deep, inky black), and six extremities branching from a central node - each terminating in complex hemispheric structures with hundreds of radially symmetric leaflets and surrounding a warm internal luminescence. Known specimens of Hexacorallius are interdependent with MinimusAeneus (Minimalist Brass), and experts are currently researching the exact mode of symbiosis through which the two species coexist. Our primitive understanding of the relationship suggests that Hexacorallius uses Minimus as a host, gradually consuming Minimus to feed its own growth. Our knowledge of Hexacorallius is rapidly evolving and we hope to have proliferation of specimens to study as the popularity of MinimusBraseriae in human habitats continues to rise, each serving as a potential host to the fascinatingly enigmatic Hexacorallius Luxus.
